Q: What's the difference between a remote Linux installation and a local one? What's the difference between a remote Linux installation and a local one? Why can't we have a remote Linux installation? Does it have to do with ssh? A: To a remote Linux installation, you are sending an IP and port to connect to, not the name of a Unix user account, as with a local installation. The installation on the remote host will need to know about the remote host's hostname and IP, and route to it, though it can be directly connected to if it only has one. If the local host can make a connection to the remote one without a relay host, it will be faster because there is no DNS lookup or port opening. If the host is on the same subnet, it will still be possible for it f678ea9f9e
